The Office for National Statistics (ONS) says that a quarter of the UK's 2.1 million self-employed people are "working for themselves", most working from home. So what if you're not being paid at the moment? Let's start by looking at how you can protect yourself. The short answer is that you have the right to take action, but whether you are legally entitled to do so is a question of the specific facts of your situation. You could be entitled to claim back your non-payment for a number of reasons, including, but not limited to, the following: If you're self-employed, this might include limited company status. The main things to think about are: Your business's legal status. If you're a sole trader or a company, your business needs to be set up in a certain way to be self-employed. This means that the main entity can't pay itself, or be its own creditor. Your business's trading history. There are different rules for sole traders and limited companies. Sole traders can trade throughout the year, but once a year the business needs to report on whether they have earned a profit. Limited companies cannot trade unless they have been set up as a limited company. Your financial arrangements. If you have any creditors or partners, the business may have been asked to share your share of the tax burden. This could lead to delays in paying you. How long will the payment delay last? As you've probably found out, sometimes the pay day will come and go without notice. Some things that can happen are that the employer has had to pay the creditors before paying you, the employer has sent you the wrong money 82157476af
